topic in the discussion is what a copyright does NOT protect. The answers are not immediately obvious, as is evinced by the fact that I frequently hear people saying “I’m going to copyright [insert non-copyrightable thing here].”

5 Things NOT Protected by Copyright Law - CLARK.LAW

It’s fairly simple: If you created the video, the copyright belongs to you; if you upload content created by someone else, the copyright belongs to that person, and you had better have permission to do it. As soon as the work is created, so is the copyright, and since 1992, there’s no longer a renewal process.

This is true even when there is no copyright symbol associated with a work. What you find on the internet is generally not fair game . Generally speaking, anything you see or read on the internet has been copyrighted, by default, given that the material (blogs, literary or artistic works, etc.) were created by someone else.
